Course description

This course examines the intersections of migration, citizenship and political participation, exploring the complex dynamics that shape the experiences of individuals and communities in an increasingly globalised world through the lens of migration. We will look at the work of scholars exploring these themes and deepen our understanding by providing the latest trends within these themes.

The course is divided into four sessions. The first session of the course briefly explores theories and new approaches to migration, citizenship and political participation.

The next three sessions are structured to provide a more in-depth analysis of migration, citizenship and political participation. Recent debates on each theme will be discussed through selected case studies, focusing particularly on, but not limited to, the Global South and Germany. Through these case studies, we will critically analyse, for example, the understanding of migration, generational phenomena in migration studies, the use of the category "people with a migration background", the meanings of citizenship, "belonging", dual loyalties, the (non-)inclusion of migrants in political processes, the role of diaspora communities in shaping the political landscape of the country of residence, and the limits of political participation.

Learning outcomes

The main objective of this course is to let students to have a greater familiarity with the different approaches to issues of migration, citizenship and political participation. By the end of the course, students who fully participate and contribute to the course will have a comprehensive understanding of these interrelated issues, migration, citizenship and political participation, from both theoretical and practical perspectives. Students will also be well prepared to contribute critically to academic and contemporary debates in the field.

Prerequisite knowledge and skills

Proficiency in English is essential for comprehending the mandatory readings, audio-visual materials, and sessions as the course is conducted in English.
